Goebbels about The Man Adolf Hitler

Part 1 of 2
All the newspapers agree, Hitler is a man of stature who has already solved an enormous historical task and knows that an even greater mission is waiting to be completed. He is the kind of statesman found only rarely in Germany. Already during his lifetime, he is greatly honored and has the good fortune to not only be respected and loved by the overwhelming majority of the German people, but even more importantly, to be understood by them.*6
All the newspapers agree, Adolf Hitler is the only German politician of the post-war era who understood the situation clearly and drew the necessary hard and firm conclusions. It no longer needs to be said that he has taken up Bismarck’s work and intends to complete it.*6
The mysterious magic that he exerts on all who come in contact with him cannot be explained alone by his historic personality. What makes him so dear and esteemed to us is much more: Through all the ups and downs of Adolf Hitler’s career, from the beginning of his political activity to the mighty crowning of his career as he took over leadership, he has always remained the same: a person among people, a friend to his comrades, an eager supporter of every ability and talent.*6
Normally it is the case that great men that we admire from a distance lose their magic and effectiveness when we get closer. With Hitler, the opposite is true. The longer one knows him, the more one admires and loves him, and the more one is willing to surrender without prejudice to his cause.*6
We love this man, and we know that he has earned all of our love and support. Never was a man more unjustly accused by the hate and slander of his envious rivals of other parties [*primarily the Communist party.] What they made him out to be! A caricature full of contradictions! There is no sin they did not invent and accuse him of, and there is no virtue they stripped off him!*6
When he, nonetheless, overcame the flood of lies, triumphing over his enemies in the end and raising the banner of his national socialistic revolution over Germany, placing its pole firmly in the ground, fate showed the entire world its favor toward him. It raised him from the masses of people and put him in the place he deserves because of the strength of his brilliant gifts and the power of his pure and flawless humanity.*6
The party had just been banned by the Marxist-Jewish police department. Heavy blows were falling on it. The discouragement, bickering and quarreling even got a hold of the party comrades. It rained accusations of each other left and right. The whole organization seemed to have fallen apart and been given up. But it was Hitler who did not lose courage, who immediately began to organize a defense campaign, and who intervened where help and action were needed.*6
Although he was bogged down with his own worries of personal and political nature, he made the time and found the nerve to push through the resistance and strengthen the backbone of his friends in Berlin... One of his fine and noble traits is that he never gives up on someone who has won his confidence. The more his political opponents attack such a person, the more resilient is Adolf Hitler’s support. He is the type who is not afraid to associate with men of a strong character. The harder and tougher a man is, the more Hitler likes him.*6
And if conflicts in the many around him explode, his redeeming ways bring everything back into harmony again. 6
One has to have seen the Fuehrer in defeat, and not in his victory to understand what sort of man he is. No blow ever brought him down. He never lost courage or faith. Hundreds came to him seeking new hope, and no one left without receiving renewed strength.*6
On the day before 13 August 1932, we met in a small farm house outside Potsdam. We talked long into the night, but not about our prospects for the next day, but rather about music, philosophy, and worldview issues.*6
Then came the hours one can only experience with him, the hours when he told of his youth. He spoke of the difficult years in Vienna and Munich, his war experiences, the first years of the party. Few know how hard and bitterly he had to fight for his place. Today he is cheered by praise and thanks. Only fifteen years ago he was a lonely individual among millions. The only difference between him and the millions was his burning faith and his fanatic resolve to transform his faith into action.*6
